Archeon has participated in the 2nd annual conference of the European project Openarch, which took place in Borger (the Netherlands) from 3 to 7 October.

The project Openarch is an initiative of 10 European archaeological open-air museums who value their heritage and establish best practices in the preservation and promotion of monuments and archaeological sites. The other participants came from Catalonia, the Netherlands, Italy, Finland, United Kingdom, Sweden and Germany.

"Bringing Archeology to Life" was the theme of this second conference, during which over 100 participants from about 10 countries sought new ways to disseminate information about their heritage. The programme was well designed and executed, a big thanks to the Hunebedcentrum. Museum directors and other representatives of European sites attended several workshops and learned about case studies to understand cultural heritage and how to present this. Among the topics discussed were the archeologist as CSI agent, future technical communication, dissemination of virtual assets, how to organize a good archeological exhibition, or demonstrations of ancient crafts and experimental archaeology. The managers of the museums present had made many good and much needed decisions to ensure successful steps for OpenArchs development. Also, the atmosphere among the participants was very good. The project OpenArch lasts until 2015, two conferences each year. The next meeting will take place in Modena (Italy), spring 2012.
